WORKING PAPERS

“Private Capital Markets and Inequality” – Revise and Resubmit, American Economic Review (SSRN, VoxEU)

with Clara Martínez-Toledano (Imperial) and Vrinda Mittal (UNC-Chapel Hill)

This paper examines how expanding private capital markets contribute to rising economic inequalities in the US. We show that the share of early-stage financing raised from US high-net-worth individuals (HNWIs) tripled from 2004 to 2022. Exploiting the expansion of the qualified small business stock (QSBS) long-term capital gains tax exclusion, we find that HNWIs’ investments made startups 5.6% more likely to stay private. Counterfactual simulations reveal that HNWIs’ excess returns on early-stage investments explain 26% of the growth in the top 0.5% wealth share over 2010-2022. Finally, investor entry increased incumbents’ returns and encouraged further investments, generating a self-reinforcing feedback loop between private capital market growth and inequality.

WORKS IN PROGRESS

“Immigration and Firm Investment” – Job Market Paper

Standard models of immigration predict that native earnings recover as firms expand their capital stocks in response to the labor supply shock. I show that this adjustment depends on firms' access to credit. I embed a costly state verification friction into a neoclassical model of the labor market effects of immigration: more indebted firms face a higher external finance premium, so they expand their capital stocks by less, and their capital-labor ratios fall by more. I test this prediction in the context of Germany during the 2010s, combining a shift-share instrument for regional immigration shocks with firm-level variation in pre-shock leverage. Higher-leverage firms hired immigrants at the same rate as lower-leverage firms but increased their capital stocks and borrowing by less. Consistent with the resulting decline in their capital-labor ratios, the earnings of their native workers fell by more.

“Immigration and Labor Market Tightness” – Presented at the Sixth World Labor Conference, 2025

with Thomas Cornelissen (Essex), Christian Dustmann (UCL), and Uta Schönberg (HKU)

This paper examines how the effects of immigration on native workers' employment and wages depend on initial labor market tightness. We first predict, based on a search-and-matching model, that the effect of immigration on native employment is less negative in an initially tighter labor market, while its effect on native wages is more negative. We then test these predictions in the context of Germany during the 2010s, when every annual inflow of immigrants entered in tighter conditions than the previous year's. Comparing the initially slackest and tightest local labor markets, we find that initial tightness attenuated immigration's negative employment effects but amplified its negative wage effects, with these heterogeneities sharper for the lower-wage natives more exposed to competition from immigrants.
